COVID-19

Know Your Rights

- Federal, state and local law protects individuals with disabilities from discrimination in facilities, employment, housing, education, and in their communities. This does not change during the COVID-19 pandemic.
- How might people with disabilities be more vulnerable to the impacts of COVID-19?
 - They may have more complex health concerns and underlying conditions.
 - They may require school-based supports and services
 - They may have a need for effective communication
 - They may depend on direct care staff for support with activities of daily living.
 - They may be more likely to live in congregate, long-term care or shelter settings where the risk of exposure is greater, and it is harder to maintain social distance
- Even in a crisis, people with disabilities have the right to live, work, learn, and access their community without discrimination or increased safety risks due to COVID-19.
